Mom, A good friend sent this quote to me. I don't know what book it's from, but it's perfect. I love you. "I'd answer all those questions you have, try to help you settle your confusion about what to do now and in the future. I'd heal your hurts and fix your problems with a bond of love, so you would never come "unglued". I just wanted you to know that I'd make life easier for you if I could. I'd find you a way over every obstacle, an answer to every prayer, a peaceful resolution to every challenge and conflict that causes the kind of hurt I know you must be feeling. None of us is promised easy magic solutions, and often it seems we must find our way alone through our brokenness. It is a weight that cannot be shared. I know that this is a difficult time for you now. I just wanted you to know that I'm thinking of you, praying for you, and trusting with you that all the things you're going through will work together for a mutual good, and you will finally see reasons for all that's happened, if that's what you need. Eventually and surely, there will be light where there was darkness. Don't despair. It will get better. I will listen if you need to talk and I'll do what I can. I just wanted you to know that you're not alone."

Hi, Dad! You're looking mighty sharp in your profile picture. I know that's how you look once again, restored to your former strength and handsomeness. I bet you're restocking health and beauty aids in all the stores in Heaven. Thank you for always being a hard worker and providing for the family, and thank you for loving us in the only way you knew how.
