The Quiet Cradle

The room still hums with lullabies that never reached your waking ear,
a mobile sways in gentle arcs, turning shadows soft and near.
Your blanket waits, a folded sky,
stitched with stars that never shone;
my arms remember holding you though you were never fully known.
The air is thick with what-ifs now,
each breath a tide that pulls away;
yet in the hush between my tears
I feel your warmth in threads of day.
No clock can measure love like this—
it blooms beyond the span of hours;
you are my seed beneath the frost,
my unseen spring, my sleeping flower.
